Beyond Competence:
Altruism, Advocacy, and Public Health

Cape Cod

October 13-16, 2001

Overview

Medicine in the New Millennium

American medicine is being reshaped by a multitude of forces operating within the health care delivery system and within society at large. Notable examples of factors influencing the health care delivery terrain include: the high cost of health care; the 42.6 million uninsured persons; the growth of evidenced-based medicine; the increased awareness of disparities in health status; and the burgeoning public interest in alternative and complementary therapies. Scientific and technological advances present health care providers with new resources, as well as with new clinical and ethical challenges. Academic Medical Centers must contend with the competitive research and clinical environment, while simultaneously struggling to balance financial pressures and to maintain the institutional mission. New guidelines from the Liaison Committee for Medical Education (LCME) will require medical schools to implement effective methods for teaching cross-cultural issues to students.

We must fine tune medical education to help physicians manage the wealth of new information, provide for the needs of diverse populations, and overcome barriers to putting patients' needs first.

Challenges and Opportunities

- As health care discussions become increasingly focused on the business of medicine, i.e., costs and structure, who is assuming responsibility for the health of the public?
- How can faculty who are experiencing increased job-related stress best teach and model the values of academic medicine we have come to take for granted?
- How can we balance the benefits of technological advances in diagnostic and treatment options and in reduction of medical errors with concerns about confidentiality, ethical integrity, and resource allocation?
- If the community is the ideal site to teach patient advocacy and partnership building skills, how can academic medical centers do a better job in working with community agencies to improve availability and access to health care resources?
- How can we create the optimal blend of evidence-based medicine and a culturally responsive, patient centered approach to care?

Objectives

At the end of this conference, participants will be able to:

- Identify strategies for introducing and reinforcing the core values of professionalism into medical education;
- Utilize various curricular approaches to teach the knowledge, attitudes, and skills essential for delivery of culturally appropriate health care;
- Combine technical information with interdisciplinary approaches to deliver patient-centered care.

Audience

- Physicians, psychologists, sociologists, anthropologists, nurses, public health practitioners, social workers, and other professionals and/or behavioral scientists engaged in medical education and practice.
- Investigators who wish to present their work to a cross-disciplinary membership for critique and dialog.
- Medical school and residency level faculty who wish to explore and develop teaching skills and new curricula in the behavioral sciences.
- Medical students and house staff planning a career in family medicine, primary-care, internal medicine, pediatrics, psychiatry, or preventive medicine.
